

Red Squirrels Northern England (RSNE) is a red squirrel conservation partnership working right across northern England. Our work is principally based in Cumbria, Northumberland, Merseyside, Lancashire, north-west Durham and the Yorkshire Dales, in and close to areas where red squirrels are still living free in the landscape. RSNE employ a team of Rangers carrying out grey squirrel control around designated red squirrel reserves. We work hand in hand with volunteers, landowners and countryside managers to make sure that our collective efforts are co-ordinated. RSNE is a partnership project between the Red Squirrel Survival Trust, the northern Wildlife Trusts, Forestry Commission and Natural England.

What Can I Do to Help?

The easiest way to help is to let us know when you see a red squirrel! You can do this easily by logging on the RSNE website at www.rsne.org.uk/sightings

Red squirrels need our help if they are to survive. If you have any spare time, why not become a volunteer? Find out the details of your local red squirrel volunteer group at www.northernredsquirrels.org.uk and get involved!

Red squirrel conservation requires funds to keep going. If you want to help, why not make a donation or become a Friend of the Red Squirrel? You can find out more details on the RSNE website.

Where to See Red Squirrels

This map demonstrates the current range of red and grey squirrels in northern England and has been drawn using all of the data we have for 2013. Our surveys have shown that red squirrels are still living across a large geographical region of northern England, however they can sometimes be difficult to spot. Listed here are 13 places where you have a good chance of seeing a wild red squirrel if you visit. Of course, we can't guarantee that you will see one! Further information about each site can be found on their respective websites. Please remember to let us know when you see a squirrel by reporting to us at www.rsne.org.uk/sightings

Do you know of a site where members of the public have a good chance of seeing red squirrels? We're always looking to update and improve our website. Please send through the details to katy.cook@rsne.org.uk
